1990 to 2005 contained some of the warmest years ever recorded, further fueling the already intense global warming debate. Despite these trends, it is difficult to conclude how much of this change is a result of human interaction with the atmosphere and how much can be attributed to natural processes not associated with human activity.