Much like the West Nile virus, the potential spread of Lyme disease is difficult to predict. Because this disease is mostly confined to the temperate zones, an increase in temperature may greatly extend the areas that would be hospitable for the ticks that transmit Lyme disease, thus providing greater exposure to the inhabitants of those regions.